VLCC

All mouth and no trousers still when it comes to a deal to reopen the now famous Strait. In the meantime, nothing material has changed, although a few ships managed to “escape” the MEG over the weekend. Going the other way, however, is no more likely than it was last week. Tonnage has “disappeared” in the area, likely heading for Oman (outside) or Yanbu to load, but not quite enough to ease the pressure on alternative cargoes in the Atlantic. That said, had you offered 3 digits for a June load Atlantic/East to the owning community a few moths back they would probably have eaten your hand – so, all about perspective. Much of the activity has gone under the radar and unless directly involved it is difficult to find out what happened and definitely not in real time – and the lack of transparency has made it much harder to gauge the market. That said, if it’s up, or more likely down, it tends to be leaked – but lack of context makes it a less credible benchmark.

Again we started the working week with a 'workable vessel count' well above average, eta West Africa within 3 weeks. First decade West Africa appears to be nearing completion, while second decade demand has also thinned amidst fresh VLCC fixtures/outstanding cargoes, and additional Suezmax mysteries. The ongoing influx of Eastern ballasters remains a key pressure point on TD20. With limited options elsewhere, there is a willingness for such vessels to secure coverage without much resistance. Whilst the US local list remains short therefore reliant on ballasters, the smaller 2nd decade CPC programme is expected to push an increasing number of vessels into the Atlantic ex-Mediterranean.

North Sea

North Sea dates are slowly moving into June. The first 5 days stems are not that populated and we have seen a lot of programming which explains the muted start to the month activity wise. Even with a continued softer US market the North Sea list is being kept balanced with vessels ballasting. Market looks like it will remain steady/soft likely through the first decade.

Mediterranean

Rates are hovering around last-done levels with decent levels of activity and the tonnage list looking much better compared to last week. Sentiment is the issue these days as owners seem to have accepted last done and at the same time fundamentals aren't helping them either.
